PLAIN PAINT PLAIN PAINT PLAIN PAINT

Despite being able to cover a bodyshell in one heavy coat, probably without runs or sags the best and most reliable way, in the sense of the paint staying on the body is to spray a series of light, thin coats allowing each one to dry thoroughly before applying the next.

Bodyshells flex a great deal, especially in crashes and although the paint does have a strong bond to the surface if one thick coat is applied it will be more rigid than the body. Should the body have to flex excessively, say in a crash, the paint layer not being as flexible as the body will inevitably crack and the bond being broken, come off. Applying the paint in a series of thin layers nets a much more flexible covering which will be less likely to come off.

These are a translucent colour that rely on a white base coat to create the effect.

When applying the colour coat it is difficult to make sure that the colour is covering evenly so split the bodyshell into sections and spray systematically. Directions on this can be found on the flip side of this leaflet under the heading 'Even Coverage'.

The actual candies are a tinted translucent lacquer, the effect being completed by backing them up with a base colour. The range includes a silver especially for this but backing up with different colours produces different effects. You can back up with white, gold, black, ordinary silver and each will produce a different overall colour.

These are the most difficult colours in the range to use but the final effect is worth the effort. The Ice Candy will need four coats and as with the fluorescents divide the body into areas and apply the coats at ninety degrees to each other to prevent patchy or streaky finishes. Put a thin initial coat on but then put on just slightly heavier than usual coats, so the paint looks just wet as it goes on.

Care should be taken to make sure that the body is free of fragments like dust and hairs before applying the Ice Candy coat as this will show through to the finish

The Fusion colours work by refraction and reflection. Depending on the angle they are viewed from they produce different colours, and so on a car changing the angle you look from will result in a body that is constantly changing in colour.

The intensity of these colours depends on how many coats of Fusion that are applied, we recommend three or four. Light Fusion coats are applied first, as usual each coat at ninety degrees to the previous one, and then a 'base coat' is put over them. As with the Ice Candies the base coat can be any colour but with the Fusions dark colours give the best effects with black being the most startling.

Keep your bodyshell offcuts and use them to experiment with colour combinations.

To allow the effect to work these colours are not quite as dense as the regular colours, will take more coats to cover and more care to attain a finish without shading. Some can be a little translucent and will benefit from a silver backing.
